A knowledge of the science and experience in the art of pruning are almost essential to a satisfactory attainment of the desired objects. Conditions and personal opinions are at such variance that this bulletin will concern itself chiefly with principles that underlie pruning practises. In every tree there is a continual struggle for life and existence between its different parts. Twigs are fighting twigs, and branches are vying with branches for light and food. Those which have some advantage, generally of position, crowd and repress the others until they become dead or of little use. This is simply the work of nature, and the result is far from desirable from the viewpoint of the fruit grower. Neither the shape assumed nor the fruit produced is conducive to economy or profit. Such a condition is however inevitable in the unpruned tree or orchard. Fruit trees should be pruned, but the work should be based upon proper principles. Poor pruning may be as disastrous as no pruning; it may fail just as completely in attaining a sought-for end. Correct practises in pruning are fundamental to the welfare and worth of a fruit tree. If people would keep in mind and understand the fact that when they cut trees they are not only changing the shape but also affecting the production, there might be more good pruning and less poor pruning done. Trees are sometimes...
